(Photo by Jason O. Watson/Getty Images) The Giants were in Washington, D.C., on Sunday to play the Nationals. They arrived at The Yard just before noon. And then something strange happened. The team got home to San Francisco about 6:30 p.m. and reported that some things had been going on -- on the field -- for hours. Within the stadium are 13,500 seats with video boards that can display messages, graphics and images. As the Giants were preparing for their exhibition game Sunday night against a Washington Nationals farm team in the winter league, the video boards were displaying images and text advising attendees that the Giants were in their dugout awaiting further instructions. The team was told to prepare the field for that evening's game with the Miami Marlins. The Giants were advised that the unique, temporary video boards at their stadium had been "flooded" with "unrelated" messages, but the messages were apparently from giant believers. Any theories on what might have happened? The Giants say that the boards on the field are considered a property of the team and that they're supposed to be accessible to anyone with a ticket. (Details on how to get into the dugout are required by National League rules.) And the Giants said no Giants employee or stadium employee would have done anything to prevent fans from enjoying the game and trying to navigate the venue.
