----- For the last eight months, I have been working on a game which I hope is fun. In late 2012, I produced a web series of the same name, which I am very proud of, and I plan to move forward with the game in 2013.

I'm going to try and do this quickly, so I will try and update the website regularly with information.

----- I will be seeking funding to produce the game. If you have any ideas or feedback, I would love to hear from you! Like the web series, this is a very quick prototype, but for now it's just the demo. I want to make the game fun, fast paced, and addictive, so please stay tuned for updates. New

What's new:

s/ConsultingModels I decided to start a new project internally for future projects since this looks like a viable option for everyone. But I will have to split my team into about 3 teams. Some will work with 3rd party portals, and some will design their own portal, integrating content from 3rd parties as well as developing their own features. I'd like to see if there's any best/recommended path for this approach. By the way, this project needs a bit of time but it has a lot of potential. Here's what I'm thinking so far: I design the application and I take most of the risk, assuming the business needs are met when I get started (Though I won't but them some time before to make sure I'm not shooting myself in the foot). It's a big risk to start like this because I'm making the libraries and web forms and control collections of elements that I developed if this project does not go well. After I've made the basic templates and shown them to management, I start developing the web controls. I can try to use the templates I developed the first time. But here is the catch: if I fail with developing the controls, I'll have to go back to them at the beginning of the project and give them a second opportunity to correct the templates and any other issues I've missed out on. This will affect my timeline and budget. Plus, I'll have to redeploy some controls since the users may not like the original ones. Next, I develop the runtime controls. I need to take this approach because I'll want to be more flexible and functional. How do I design the runtime controls for a web forms app without making a bunch of assumptions from the start? Are there any patterns or strategies I should look into? Development of all of the features (even the ones with low priority) - as items get assigned to me, I implement them. This way I can ship items with haste and I could cancel any of the items without abandoning the project. Are my assumptions about what I should and should not do correct? Is there any advice out there for a situation like this? A: You have two problems: 1. the overhead from a new development team, that of course doesn't have a lot of time to spend on your library. 2. in a more general sense, adding new controls to a project. I think you are on the right track

Introduction
===== The sacroiliac joint (SIJ) is the most commonly involved sacroiliac joint in traumatic injuries. The traumatic injuries of the SIJ are very common and include both fractures and dislocations. Although the prevalence of the unstable injury of the SIJ is quite common (40%), it is difficult to diagnose preoperatively. The authors report a case of SIJ unstable injury that was diagnosed preoperatively and successfully treated by anatomic reduction and fixation using transiliac screws. Case Report ===== A 48-year-old male patient presented with a history of hip pain, which was present since November of 2006. He was taking nonsteroidal anti-inflammatory drugs. He also had history of polytrauma secondary to a motorcycle accident in which he had fractures of the right acetabulum, the right iliac wing, and the right acetabulum on T2 to T9 vertebral levels with subluxation of the right sacroiliac joint and dislocation of the left femoral head. He also had a history of laparotomy with colorectal resections. The patient was otherwise healthy.

Neurological examination was normal. A computed tomography (CT) scan with 3-D reconstruction of the pelvis, including the SIJ, was made. It showed dislocation of the right sacroiliac joint associated with a right greater trochanter fracture. The preoperative diagnosis was that of
