Q: Why are these Subset of DataFrames and Arrays different? So I have this simple question. I have an Array and a Dataframe: val arr = Array(Array(10, 0.3), Array(20, 0.2), Array(30, 0.1)) val df1 = sc.parallelize(arr.map(Array(_))) Then I have a Dataframe which is a subset of the first one, namely a slice: val df2 = df1.filter(f => f._1 == 20) Now, df1 and df2 look like this: +--------+ | _1| +--------+ | 10| | 20| | 30| +--------+ And +----+ | _1| +----+ | | 20| | +----+ So what is the problem with those two DataFrames? Why does df2 have an extra row? A: You're applying Array to two different things, resulting in a tuple, which is then treated like a list. If you have a dataframe and want to specify the columns to apply f to, you should use df.select instead of df.filter. From the documentation: filter - Return a dataframe with all rows where the specified column(s) matches the specified expr. ... Select as a method of DataFrame; selects only specified columns for each row. In modern electronics, engineering productivity is a critical issue. Application of higher integration in semiconductor devices causes a problem of delay in signal processing speed in the devices. One of conventional methods for improving the delay in signal processing speed in the devices is to scale down the length of a transistor from the current technology to the next technology. However, a serious problem accompanies this scaling down of the length of a transistor. That is, a threshold voltage of a transistor is reduced and the drive capability of a transistor is degraded when the length of a transistor is scaled down in the next technology. As an alternative of the scaling down of the length of a transistor, it is proposed to use a transistor including a strained silicon. The strained silicon is a silicon which is
