Using this data, developers have been able to change the player's characteristics, such as dribbling techniques and goalkeeping, to more accurately reflect the real-life movements of these players. This has resulted in players that are much more realistic, and much easier to control, when playing in motion. Motion Capture - This new, high fidelity motion capture system captures every movement of every player on the pitch, and the resulting data can be used to change how the game plays and looks. This new, high fidelity motion capture system captures every movement of every player on the pitch, and the resulting data can be used to change how the game plays and looks. Retaining Virtual Realism - High fidelity motion capture is not the only way that FIFA 22 pushes the virtual reality envelope. Precision hand modelling technology has been employed across the board, meaning that players are shown with natural, human-like hands with knuckles and joints, and fingers, but are able to hold and play football with the same precision and control as all the other players in the game. This results in players looking and playing like players in the real world, and reacting in a believable way, under pressure and in the heat of battle. How does it work? Players can control elements in the game's 'Intelligent Agent' system to make active decisions, such as when to make a run, pass or tackle, and when to take control of the ball, as well as when to use the 'Airbrake' to stop or slow down. More intelligent behaviour can also be applied to opponents, allowing them to play more like people and less like machines. This includes increased reaction speeds, more accurate and intelligent path-finding, and even stronger AI opponents. FIFA 22's hyper-intelligent AI also makes players adapt more to the game-context, meaning that they adjust their behaviour depending on whether they're up against a team-mate, an opposition player, a goalkeeper or no opposition at all. This includes improved personal tacking behaviours that enable players to adjust their passing strategies and skills in order to use their teammates' strengths to their advantage. FIFA 22 AI also makes players adapt more to the game-context, meaning that they adjust their behaviour depending on whether they're up against a team-mate, an opposition player, a goalkeeper or no opposition at all. Will I be able to transfer out players from 20 to 22? Yes. If you've transferred in a player from 20 to 22 using Ultimate Team or via a Network Adapter, you'll be able to use those players in FIFA 20 Ultimate Team once EA releases the season update. Please note that if you do transfer in any new players and they appear in FIFA 22 Ultimate Team, you may be left with players who will not be transfer-able to FIFA 21. As a reminder, there are two ways to transfer out players from FIFA 20 - by using a new Network Adapter or via FIFA Ultimate Team. Players who are new to FIFA (both 20 and Ultimate Team) will find they are now able to transfer in players. If you have transferred in these players in FIFA 20, they will work for you in FIFA 21 and onwards. If you have transferred in these players in FIFA 20 but are unable to transfer them from Ultimate Team, you can buy a Network Adapter for £3.99. Players who are Transfer-In (you have at least one in FIFA 20) will not work in FIFA 21. To transfer these players out and into FIFA 20, you'll need to use a Network Adapter. WAL for distributed WAL-based streaming replication. In D-Sim we studied the performance of the proposed WAL-based distributed streaming replication. We found that in systems with a small number of disks (i.e., servers), scale-out with WAL-based replication provides higher throughput than scale-up as we can keep the I/O load at a minimum by streaming incremental WAL to the new replica. For instance, for a system with  $n$  disks, the replication is scale-up if both the old and new replicas write to the same disk whereas it is scale-out if both the old and new replicas writes to a different disk. Note that we assumed streaming replication in this experiment, i.e., the secondary replica is built from the last incremental WAL. If the secondary replica is not built from the last incremental WAL, as our case study with 10 servers shows in
