They seem to behave in the same way, i.e. when the app is launched, it calls the start service method with an observer ID and a notification ID (as optional). The only difference I can see is that the PendingIntent holds a result code and the ContentObserver has the observer ID. Am I right or are there more differences? If there are more differences, could you tell me what the difference is and when to use one over the other? A: You are right, PendingIntents do have a difference as the documentation states: A PendingIntent is an identifier that represents the intent to perform a particular action at a future time, using one or more intents as necessary. They are time related. ContentObserver are different in that they only notify you when your app is running and you just want to know when there is something in your app's data which needs to be processed.
