Windows 7,Vista,8,8.1,10 x64 / x86/ x64-arx / x64-In current Internet services, users may access server content pages through use of personal computers (PCs) or other Internet-enabled devices such as personal digital assistants (PDAs), etc. One problem with such content is that the content is static in nature. For example, the content may be a downloaded page that contains text and images. With the advent of the World Wide Web (WWW), it is now possible to provide, through server content, content to be viewed through a browser that is executed on the device accessing the server. For example, a user may access a web server to obtain a first page that contains a list of stocks, and if the user clicks on a “Buy” button next to a certain stock, the user is then able to access a web page that contains pricing and perhaps other information for buying the stock. Providing such content to users through web servers is commonly referred to as the use of “virtual worlds.” However, as web servers have become ever more sophisticated, it has become necessary to allow users to navigate from one page to another in order to access the content. Since web servers often provide content through subcategories, content that is relevant to a particular subcategory may be buried within multiple web pages, so that the user must sort through several pages in order to find it. In order to access content of a particular web server, the user usually must know which web server and particular content he or she wants to access. In practice, the user may have to browse through several web servers to find the content. This can be a laborious task that c6a93da74d
