Crack [TOP] For Windows Vista Activation

i cant verify that this will work, but from observation, windows vista creates a rearm.sdf file. if you move this file, or temporarily disable file signing, windows will not build a new rearm.sdf. what are the differences between windows vista and windows server 2008 r2? anybody else notice that some of the enterprise pack is licensed for use only on server? this worries me, because if vista is supposed to be server-grade, skiprearm would make its way onto a server instance. well, skiprearm is in the r2 enterprise pack, which is fine with me. but something is off. however, piracy still proves lucrative for pirates due to the high cost of windows vista upgrades. the vista upgrade is 7 times more expensive than xp, and microsoft has been forced to pump millions into anti-piracy campaigns to prevent pirates from passing off counterfeit versions of the software on to uninitiated users. if someone buys a genuine version of xp, the user must perform the activation process. in order to offset this piracy, microsoft has created a lengthy activation process. vista is designed to make it difficult to crack the activation keys. to activate the product, a user must supply a product key at purchase and then enter the product key into the registry. but microsoft has protected the registry from being changed through its compatibility check functionality. disable wga, delay activation when a windows vista user is prompted to enter the product key to activate, the key can be changed by editing the machine's registry. but unfortunately for pirates, there is a snag.
