FSX - Nemeth Designs EC 135 (RIP) Crack

the ecureuil had four seats and was a conventional tricycle undercarriage configuration. with the main rotor attached to the nose, the fuselage was completely covered. it had twin engines and the tail boom could fold inwards. intended for the french civil market, a prototype was ordered in late 1975 and flown in the spring of 1977. it was no great success with french buyers and the project was abandoned before any production order was placed. a french army order for five aircraft in 1982 was also cancelled. with the end of the ht 500 and sea owl, the underpowered ecureuil became the last french civil helicopter product. the dedicated military sabre fighter trainer programme was shelved in november 1975 but the dassault mirage iii and the seat of a mirage iv didn't fill the bill. a compromise was reached with a new design being proposed by a group including francis dubost, jean-jacques hordieux and alain rossignol of the société française de mécanique des vecteurs (sfmv). this design had twin tandem-seat layout to accommodate four training student simultaneously and a side-by-side seat for the instructor. the lockheed u-3 aircraft, which had been built for the us army to meet a requirement for light helicopter trainer, was selected in january 1976, but the programme was cancelled in favour of the aérospatiale alouette iii. a retractable undercarriage was used and the first production ecureuil p.1 powered by a 601 shp turbomeca arriel b4.2 engine with an eco-tec rotor head and a 110kn payload was delivered in may 1976. the p.2 flown in june 1977 with a 602 shp engine had a slightly larger tail rotor. shortly after, the first chasseur production ecureuil p.3 was delivered and powered by a 410 shp turbomeca arriel b3 engine. with the end of the alouette iii programme, the ecureuil was the only one of dassault's light helicopters still in production. in january 1978, the production order was amended to one p.4 production model.
