The large number of citations in papers documents the growing impact of a slowly rising exponential curve of research output. Over 90% of papers have an impact factor, the average number of citations accrued by a published paper, of ≈ 10 citations, and $\sim 10\%$ have > 50 citations ([@bib3], [@bib4], [@bib1], [@bib2], [@bib5], [@bib6], [@bib7], [@bib8], [@bib9]). The majority of papers with impact factors have a few core journals as their citation venues, the top 20-25 ([@bib4], [@bib1], [@bib2], [@bib5], [@bib6], [@bib7], [@bib8], [@bib9]). Over the past decades, the fraction of research spending of scientists by journals has increased, highlighting the role of a few journals in publishing a large fraction of published papers ([@bib3], [@bib4]). Without considering other filters such as the quality of the papers and reviewers for the journals, the high degree of within-journal connectivity shows that most of the citations accrued by papers come from a small fraction of the journal's cited papers. Therefore, journals become the main drivers of science. While most papers having impact factor have \ 79a2804d6b
