Bonin, Polynesia Bonin is a small island in the Polynesian Triangle, part of the Polynesian archipelago in French Polynesia. It lies northeast of Tahiti and southwest of the Hawaiian island of Maui. It is located at the southeast corner of French Polynesia, where the three principal islands of French Polynesia, Tahiti, and Australasia meet. The island of Tahiti is divided from Bonin by the shortest distance between the two islands of the archipelago, the Agena Gulf. On 15 July 2010, a commercial flight from the resort of Papeete to the island of Tahiti crashed and caught fire on its way to Bonin. All thirty-seven passengers and crew died as a result. History The island was discovered in 1606 by French navigators and named "Isle Saint-Léonard". It was occupied by the French during the 18th and 19th centuries and administered as a part of the French protectorate of Tahiti. It was taken from France in 1888 by the native Tahitians in a struggle for independence. At the time of its purchase in 1888, the island was named "Île Des Rats" (Island of Rats) and was often visited by rats, hence the name. In World War II, the island was the base of the French forces of New Caledonia. On 1 January 2010, the French territory of Wallis and Futuna was merged into French Polynesia. Climate Bonin has a tropical climate, with a dry season from December to May and a wet season from June to November. The island has a population of about 1000. Most of the population lives on the large town of Faa'a, located on the western coast of the island. Economy As a tourist destination, the island is known for its offshore reefs and the surrounding sea. The island is also known for its vast undersea archaeological sites, which are remnants of the Polynesian culture. The reef features an unusually large number of shipwrecks and underwater archaeological sites. Surrounding the undersea sites are coral gardens, which are
