If you were planning to buy Lightroom 5, there's one thing you really need to consider: It's FREE. (Yes, even if you are a Mac user, it's FREE.) Adobe has always been good at making money in other ways, so don't expect this for any other software. For example, it costs $50 per month on the subscription model, which is ridiculously high. Subscriptions can renew and you cannot get a refund, even if you want one. They are also not easy to cancel. Switching to the perpetual model is a nightmare, as you'll have to either pay for your subscription a month in advance and pay 3 months in advance of the renewal, or you might lose access to your library. If you happen to buy an iPad, you can get a subscription for a much cheaper price, but that's getting off-topic. The point is, with a subscription you're pretty much locked into the software forever. This is also the first version that has Wi-Fi support, which is good because the default "Subscribe" model for the Lightroom platform is also Wi-Fi only. It is well-blocked, but it's still nice to have available, especially for vacation. In terms of user experience, Lightroom 5 basically hasn't changed all that much from 4.x. Import was still a cinch, even with a huge number of images. The only real mystery is the "Open dialog" that is context sensitive to the tab that you open it in. You can get it open in the Import window, you can get it open during Import, or you can even get it open during Edit. It's context sensitive, so you can easily go to the right place. You can also get to the panel with Import/Export and other stuff in the LR5 Import window panel. Export is also a cinch, and you'll be able to use the left and right arrow buttons to select your preferred format, a batch selection of images, or the option to use an Auto Import. You can even set a default location to download images (if you are connected to a Wi-Fi network) by dragging and dropping images from the right to the left, similar to the old ImagineXtensios 3 desktop application).

The software is also particularly useful to users who may be using smartphones and tablets.
