Adobe has done the best it can to provide the necessary resources to help you benefit from the new camera RAW process, bringing both performance and features improvements to Lightroom 5. For example, new features such as the Map and Rotate features in the Lens Correction tool should help you get to work quickly, with many more options at your disposal. I, however, am still in the process of experiencing Lightroom 5's camera RAW editing for myself. That said the upcoming updates coming to it are certainly in the right direction. I just hope that Adobe will continue to expand the system that is now in place so that it will be capable of handling all the new image processing operations which are enabled with the new Camera RAW file format. This is a great tool for a lot of things but lacks some fundamental features such as ICO and TIFF support. The source needs to be downloaded, so import/export scripts should be available in the future. The document format needs to be supported by the Adobe software. The supported format (from version CS5 and prior to version CS6) does not fully support the image industry standard. It sadly represents a flaw, but certainly not a major one. In addition, for some strange reason, the application can not import Type 1 font files. My conclusion, therefore, is that the application lacks some serious features that you need in order to use this powerful tool for daily business. Lesson 1: You need to demand from Adobe the feature set you need, and not what you do with your images.
